The blood copper to zinc ratio is a measure of the relative levels of these two essential minerals in the blood. Copper and zinc are involved in many biological processes, such as immune function, antioxidant defense, gene expression, and brain development. They also interact with each other and compete for absorption and transport in the body. Therefore, maintaining a balanced copper to zinc ratio is important for optimal health.

A normal blood copper to zinc ratio is between 0.7 to 1.0, based on the studies discussed here¹. However, this ratio may vary depending on the method of measurement, the reference range used, and the individual factors that affect copper and zinc levels. Some of these factors include age, gender, diet, supplementation, medication, infection, inflammation, stress, and genetic variations²³.

A high blood copper to zinc ratio means that there is more copper than zinc in the blood. This can indicate a copper excess, a zinc deficiency, or both. A high copper to zinc ratio can have negat

A low blood magnesium to calcium ratio means that there is more calcium than magnesium in the blood. This can indicate a calcium excess, a magnesium deficiency, or both. A low magnesium to calcium ratio can also have negative effects on health, such as:

Increased muscle tension and spasms

Impaired nerve function and pain

High blood pressure and heart rate

Irregular heartbeat and angina (chest pain)

Anxiety and irritability

Insomnia and restlessness

Nausea and vomiting

Constipation and kidney stones

Hypercalcemia (high blood calcium) and hyperparathyroidism (high parathyroid hormone)²³⁴

Some of the causes of a low magnesium to calcium ratio include:

High intake of calcium-rich foods or supplements

Low intake of magnesium-rich foods or supplements

Impaired absorption or excretion of calcium or magnesium

Use of diuretics or antibiotics that deplete magnesium

Kidney disease or failure

Hyperthyroidism (high thyroid hormone)

Diabetes mellitus or diabetic ketoacidosis

Alcoholism or chronic alcohol abuse²³⁴
