The federal law on murder

In Australia, murder is a criminal offence where a person, by a voluntary act or omission, causes the death of another person with either intent to kill, intent to inflict grievous bodily harm, or with reckless indifference to human life.[1] It may also arise in circumstances where the accused was committing, or assisting in the commission, of a different serious crime that results in a person's death. It is usually punished by life imprisonment. Australia is a federal nation and the law of murder is mostly regulated under the law of its constituent states and territories. There is also federal murder offence available in limited circumstances.[2]

The "Chevron case" refers to the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision in Loper Bright Enterprises v. Raimondo (2024), which overturned the Chevron deference doctrine established in Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. (1984). The Chevron doctrine allowed courts to defer to federal agencies' interpretations of ambiguous laws, provided those interpretations were reasonable. This was a significant aspect of how U.S. regulatory agencies operated for decades.

19:43:49 From Julie Parker to Everyone:

In the Loper Bright decision, the Supreme Court ruled that Chevron deference is incompatible with the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) and the Constitution, arguing that courts should not defer to agencies on questions of law, particularly when those laws are ambiguous. The ruling asserts that it's the judiciary's responsibility to interpret laws independently, rather than allowing agencies to do so based on their expertise.

19:43:59 From Julie Parker to Everyone:

This decision is expected to have widespread implications, leading to more legal challenges against federal regulations and potentially reducing the power of federal agencies to interpret laws without judicial oversight. The ruling marks a significant shift in the balance of power between the judiciary and the executive branch in the U.S. legal system(
